

A New Ruler: Redefining Wealth and Status

Not about refusing to measure — people always measure. It is about changing the source of the reading

Old reading · the number comes from outside

W Wealth: how much money, assets, title
Satisfaction comes from how others see me

New reading · the number is not in the market

W Wealth = nothing lacking within
The reading is internal

S Status: where other people place you
Satisfaction comes from how others see me

S Status = being needed by others
The reading lives in relationships

Mechanism of Wealth: self-consistency

No dependence on outside judgement — you read it yourself.
And no reaching outward — you need both halves.
With only "no dependence", people still keep asking.

Test: for the same act (earning money, say),
does the satisfaction come from others, or from yourself?

Mechanism of Status: how you treat those near you

The source isn't inside you; it is in the relationship.
This blocks the worst pathology of self-consistency — self-enclosure. One foot stays outside, in relationships.

One reading inward, one outward, so you don't shrink,
and don't fall back into market pricing.

Precondition: health

Not a peer item but a precondition — without it neither reads.
And there is an irony here: chasing big outcomes means being busy — you may not live to collect the payout.

Practice: happiness is a skill, not a trait

If it were a trait, this volume is useless — traits can't be taught.
And "skill" does extra work: skills can be poor, trained, or decay — but a skill isn't virtue. Lacking it isn't a sin.

The old ruler isn't abolished, nor the words wealth and status — only the source of the reading

Telling people not to care about wealth or status fails — the desire won't vanish. Redefine what counts, and the desire stays while the measure changes.
That is the one thing this entire volume does.
